Many of these contributions were made through the Mille Lac's federal PAC. The tribe also maintained a PAC for state giving. Between the two, the tribe actively supported Democratic candidates for both the state and federal legislatures, as well as a number of Republican candidates and party organizations.

Mille Lacs tribal leaders indicated that contributions decisions were coordinated internally by tribal council member Doug Twait and were made in consultation with the tribe's state and federal lobbyists – Sikorski and his partners, and Kitto – as well as the tribe's gaming management partner. Contributions were made from the tribe's PACs, as well as from tribal accounts designated for public relations or discretionary funding, and even on occasion from generally budgeted funds. In any event, Anderson said the funds were always derived from casino revenues, and not other tribal resources.

Though Anderson did not recall Stetson playing any role in the tribe's decision to make its first substantial DNC contribution in September 1995, records show that Stetson did solicit the tribe for a greater DNC contribution in August 1996. The next month, the tribe made an additional $15,000 contribution to the DNC. However, the tribe made this contribution shortly
